

ABSTRACT

A method for maintaining the security of a wireless database management system (WDMS) including steps of encrypting data for transmission through both hard-wired and wireless networks, authenticating user identities, timing out idle connections, assigning sessions, and categorizing types of user access. Each component of the structure of a WDMS is described along with the various security techniques employed for securing the data transmitted and received by that component.

CH02/22146203.6